THE YELLOW HOUSE BY E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM PDF

Positively every one, with two unimportant exceptions, had called upon us. The Countess had driven over from Sysington Hall, twelve miles away, with two anæmic-looking daughters, who had gushed over our late roses and the cedar trees which shaded the lawn. The Holgates of Holgate Brand and Lady Naselton of Naselton had presented themselves on the same afternoon. Many others had come in their train, for what these very great people did the neighborhood was bound to endorse. There was a little veiled anxiety, a few elaborately careless questions as to the spelling of our name; but when my father had mentioned the second "f," and made a casual allusion to the Warwickshire Ffolliots—with whom we were not indeed on speaking terms, but who were certainly our cousins—a distinct breath of relief was followed by a gush of mild cordiality. There were wrong Ffolliots and right Ffolliots. We belonged to the latter. No one had made a mistake or compromised themselves in any way by leaving their cards upon a small country vicar and his daughters. And earlier callers went away and spread a favorable report. Those who were hesitating, hesitated no longer. Our little carriage drive, very steep and very hard to turn in, was cut up with the wheels of many chariots. The whole county within a reasonable distance came, with two exceptions. And those two exceptions were Mr. Bruce Deville of Deville Court, on the borders of whose domain our little church and vicarage lay, and the woman who dwelt in the "Yellow House."

Mystery or Morality?

By Dharma

Kate Ffolliot has returned to England after "taking a degree" in Germany. She is living with her father, a learned and aesthetic clergyman, and her sister Alice, in a small northern town, where her father has recently been appointed. Kate is pretty and popular and has received many visitors, including the social gossip Lady Naselton. Their house is near the property of Deville Court, the property of the impoverish and anti-social Bruce Deville. Nearby, in a yellow house, lives the successful writer and social crusader Mrs. Adelaide Fortress.

Into this quaint scene comes Stephen Berdenstein, a millionaire adventurer recently returned from Rio de Janeiro. When he is killed, his sister, Olive Berdenstein, pursues the man whom she thinks is responsible: Philip Maltabar.

Much of the plot of the novel, and the thrill for Victorian readers, lies in the quaint morality of "illegitimacy" and marriage as practiced during that period. The story is told in the first person by Kate, which is unusual for Oppenheim.

Originally published as "As a Man Lives" in 1898. Often republished as "The Yellow House."
